Old-Time Travelling in Spain.

The following extract from a letter written in 1624 by a member of the escort who attended the transport of the royal jewels of England from Madrid to London, after the breaking off of the Spanish match, is curious as showing the safety of travelling in Spain at the time, as well as the characteristic story-telling facility of at least one of the convoy. Spanish brigandage, which we were apt to associate with Andalusian lands, does not seem to have existed at the time this letter was written:

We were but five horsemen in all our seven days' journey from Madrid to Bilbao, and the charge Mr. Witches had is valued at four hundred thousand crowns; but 'tis such safe travelling in Spain that one may carry gold in the palm of his hand, the government is so good. When we had gained Biscay Ground we passed one day through a forest, and, alighting off our mules to take a little repast under a tree, we took down our alforgas and some bottles of wine (and you know 'tis ordinary here to ride with one's victuals about him), but as we were eating we spied two huge wolves, who stared upon us awhile, but had the good manners to go away. It puts me in mind of a pleasant tale I heard Sir Thomas Fairfax relate of a soldier in Ireland, who, having got his passport to go to England, as he passed through the wood with his knapsack upon his back, being weary, sat down under a tree, where he opened his knapsack and fell to some victuals he had; but on a sudden he was surprised with two or three wolves, who, coming toward him, he threw them scraps of bread and cheese till all was gone, then, the wolves making a nearer approach to him, he knew not what shift to make, but by taking a pair of bagpipes which he had; as soon as he began to play upon them the wolves all ran away as if they had been scared out of their wits; whereupon the soldier said,—"The devil take you all; if I had known you loved music so well you should have had it before dinner!"
